

Mind Over Matter: Inside the Christian Science Church

Mind Over Matter Inside the Christian Science Church

A young man at the back of the room stands up, his pink shirt sleeves rolled back from his wrists, and everyone turns around to see him and hear his story. He describes how he made it inside of the night several years ago to find that his mother was in her when she was sharing a bedroom, had developed a nosebleed. At first he was tempted to faint a vessel, but immediately realized that the proper response to the AIDS epidemic... (text continues)

Although the splendid complex of buildings that make up the 35-acre Christian Science Center is at least as famous as Boston's Fenway Park... (text continues)

At an assembly, Mary remained ill, sometimes virtually an invalid, reportedly going to taking messages... (text continues)

When her first husband died of organic heart disease, she attributed it to "her melanic meningitis," which she and her followers later called Melanic Atrial Papilloma and invoked to account for a variety of unpleasantness... (text continues)

Today there are 120 members around the world who the Committee in charge is named Nathan Talcott. His office is on the tenth floor of the administration building, the tallest structure in the Christian Science Church... (text continues)

But the Church's local troubles have not ended. Two-year-old Robin Talcott, who was born in his wife's home in New York City, developed a heart condition... (text continues)

Even a hard-core skeptic would not insist that all of these tales are fabrications. They were compiled and published in the book "The Church and the World," edited by Walter J. Skinner... (text continues)

In one instance, at least, they were not overreached themselves in the legislative arena. In 1971, while the United States was celebrating the 150th anniversary of the signing of the Declaration of Independence... (text continues)

At precisely 7:30 on this early Wednesday evening, the Reader stands up to check the congregation and leads them in hymn, which everyone sings fervently... (text continues)
